The effects of immediate and delayed cyclosporin A immunosuppression on the development of the murine cardiac allograft. Long-term survival (> 100 days) after cardiac transplantation has yet to be achieved. This study sought to determine the effect of cyclosporin A (CsA) administration on the first week after heart transplantation on the development of allograft rejection. The effects of CsA given either immediately after transplantation (immediate CsA) or 7 days after transplantation (delayed CsA) were assessed in mice undergoing murine cardiac transplantation using alloantigen-specific tolerance induction. Transplantation of donor hearts from parental C57BL/6 mice into heterozygous C3H/HeJ recipients in which CsA was administered was associated with a reduced incidence of acute rejection. When CsA was administered immediately after transplantation, transplantation survival was significantly reduced (P
